

Two thousand distinct positive integers are written down in a list. It so happens that the product of any three distinct numbers from the list is a perfect square. What is the minimal number of these integers that must be perfect squares?